

Any rule, regulation or other governing action taken by the FCC or Federal government should ensure that it does not weaken any state law. Indiana's telephone privacy law was long overdue as is similar federal action. We have benefited from the Indiana law and are very glad that we have it. It has allowed us more privacy and less disruption in our lives. We believe our country, our Constitution and our Bill of Rights were focused on individual rights and the protection of those rights. That includes the right to the pursuit of happiness. Happiness does not include unsolicited and undesired interruptions in our lives that forces us to give up our personal lives simply to listen to someone else try to sell us something whether it be a good, a service or an opinion. We expect our federal government to be a representative government protecting our individual rights. Please implement a telephone privacy regulation that protects our privacy and pursuit of happiness, and does not weaken existing state laws that achieve that. Thank you.
